Invitation

Mak Dizdar

And now
let us finally go

now
let us clearly depart

In this
unwitnessed walk

finally
there

In the sack there is the bread and the stone

there is the knife
and the heart

let us go

let us depart from there where we do not remember whether we ever were or at any time were anything

we arrived there
truly long ago
as what we are

what we are
we have neither concealed nor dreamed

plowing into the deep watery world without the plow

there where already is the measure that never was

plowed it is not

there where it already is sowed without the sower

there where the fruits hang low beneath the true hand

the harvest is not only in the hands at the sacrificial altar

let us depart there where the graves are sufficiently romantic
and sufficiently dreadful

always without the hoe
dug for us

there where no one barter (still humming in my ears is the sound of that trumpet, of that horn, drums still rumbling

inside the eardrums hills

still freshly glued
on the posters

and the announcers have stayed what they were zealous in duty
and for every praise.)
