Checkpoint

at the checkpoint made of tree trunks and barrels filled with sand, a group of pale bus riders standing in a meandering line depends on one man whose belly will soon have his blouse buttons burst.

am I a Jew: a Muslim: a Catholic:
which one does he want to hate more: will my name on the soiled piece of paper confuse him or make him pull me out by my shirt sleeve as if I were a disposable part of the human race, deemed perhaps to be worthy of living or dying, as my uncle used to say, by the look of my penis: am I saved or doomed if he suddenly remembers, or I do, that we went to the same high school:

as I try to keep my sternomastoids from twitching, my mind from being forced to accept that someone who has no power over life is a bigger coward than someone who does, he positions himself before me, his sourish breath becoming my breath:

Do you know if Maria's still there:
his words burn on my face like ember: there, meaning in the city: and I feel cold sweat run down my spine: am I done for if I say yes, or if I say no, pretend I did or did not recognize him:

but he just grins and hands me back my papers, moving to a young woman next to me and motioning with his hand for her to step out, still glancing at me, while I rock back and forth, staring past him, past my life, at the jagged line of skeleton trees on the mountain ridge where the dying daylight still lingers.
