Sights that I wish for, III

Jozefina Dautbegovi? Stars don't exist to beautify our nighttime sky They are black coals, remnants of matter that didn't spare itself they burned up in their own fire and they now live only when light falls on them - the light of other bodies that also burn up unstintingly Thus if we too selflessly burn to the end the glow of others' love will fall on us making us visible in the total dark In the total devastation the glow of other stars will fall on our dead bodies and far away we will still seem to quiver to pulse, to radiate light Illusion is a form of existence too until it gets shattered Fire will always happen somewhere and the happy possibility will always exist that our charred bodies enter the glowing circle and suddenly shine with relayed light

so we shouldn't give up on expanding
