Morning among the Trees

Mak Dizdar

In the forceful fine dust That showers down from the blue fountain On my palms are hot poppies

Withered branches already dark ripe

Early wounds and crows

From a jump that never falls into any sweetness

The flower of a vanished smile Live barefooted desires

And there is the dear moisture in the depth of a dark eye

And the venom of the grass strand of a still awakening autumn hair

And something from the hands of trust that carry and lead

When they navigate the stars they defy

Beyond blue, real blue

That will not become reality So for whom then is

This blood For whom are these daring flowers

For whom these poor legs that at times hobble

But while hobbled never kneel

The slim property of one who loves

When he swears and begs for a promised light

Even when it has passed From some great river

It is there Upright it flows

In the eternal leap merciless For itself and for me

Not blurred, No but absent From it she does not flee

Then waiting futilely it connects us madly Squeezes

And hurts constantly

Because this morning it is born in the trees and does not bring us together

Double-faced as the past evening

Note: The abstruse poem, we think, is an allusion to when Odyssey awakes in the morning hearing Nausicaa playing with her maids. He emerges naked from the forest before the daughter of the Phaeacian King, Alcinous. The two are smitten holding a love interest never expressed. Unlike her maids, Nausicaa, however, does not flee from Odysseus. She has him bathed, clothed, and fed before taking him to her home, wondering if he might become her husband. The goddess Athena, Nausicaa's shadow, plays matchmaker.
