Waiting For My Soul

Adin Ljuca

for Dominika Křestánová

Dear Wayles, I'm back from a long journey.
Rain saw me off in Prague and greeted me in Syracuse.
Were the heavens lamenting my departure or my return?
Or was it just a normal change of location
which I try to assign some emotional higher sense to?
The plane took off gently, pierced the Prague rain and climbed through the clouds. Gray, dark, when seen from below but here they shine brilliant white. I meant to write:
"from a bird's-eye view" but I soon realized that birds never do
see them that way — only human pride rises so high.
Blinded by fear of flying, by brilliant sun
and an aureole of clouds, I sailed through the heavenly blueness,
as if looking from the other world to view ours.
In the heavens it was better weather than on Earth.
Even in hell it's better than where wars are fought.
I listen to music to relax. Only silence can rival it in strength. With hundreds of miles behind us,
my legs grow numb from sitting still in the seat.

But then—a red spot far down on the horizon: the sun
is low, dangerously low, as if not setting
but sinking and drowning in the white silence.
With a routine hand motion I shut the window shade
as one closes a finished book.

I've brought two "American poems" from Europe and carried a handful of poetic images that the strict inspectors
in Prague and Atlanta let pass and imposed no duty...
And this e-mail that I'm writing you
I think I'll rework into a poem... but first I must, as the Indians once used to
when arriving after a long journey, sit down and wait
for my soul to catch up with me.
