Morning Glory Sarajevo

Ferida Duraković

For M.H.

This town, catching up to us, clasping us to its arms and around our necks – we watch it from above.

We are Caesars of the moment, breathing in Sarajevo's breath: human bodies, divine blossoms, murmuring stations...

the calm of the Japanese cherry in the State Museum Garden, and those who were dear to us and nested in our bosoms like vipers...

One of us waves his hand toward the ruined tower high above in the air as if giving the permission for it to be built anew, and says:

Still, this is an incredible town.

Let us go, then, you and me...

Downwards. The face of History ought to be perceived with more modesty. Only thus shall we be reflected in ourselves: How big were we amidst poverty and splendor? Neither poor nor splendid, but... so-so that – God forbid – neither befalls us...

Each of us tore off for himself what the haughtier and greater had conquered, with a simple and sublime account: addition, multiplication, division, subtraction...

Let us go, then... - we, the masters of the air-made tower, let us go down to the town, quiet And hurt by everything.

Let us glide down the street's palm like raindrops, so our dreams do not come true — they are all the same: addition, multiplication, division, subtraction...
