The Girls of My Youth

Mile Stojić

The girls of my youth, nausicaas
The girls of my youth, dianas, danaias, lolitas they are only in their forties, but they are already gray haired, creased foreheads, wrinkled hands those "ladylike ones behind the sewing machines" Many of them are already toughened, have already forgotten love as a foreign language is forgotten.

The girls of my youth, ruths and sulamkas
The girls of my youth, sea fairies have large and empty eyes
All of their tears they have depleted
But they were as if created for adultery, sisters of esther and judith

All of their adulteries they spent in bomb shelters, in basements, in lines for bread all of their sinful thoughts they bestowed upon the dead Sometimes in passing they smile at me but more with care, like a mother to a foolish child When, during coffee, I mention missed opportunities they say: you left, and you still feel up to it. You don't know how it is to be numb to everything When winter gives birth to its child

Their heavy hair I sometimes ruffle in dreams Their proud behinds I touch with the rustle of silk Their small breasts I gently cover with palms and I think: by god, in ten years they will all be dead

Quickly will die these goddesses of my youth crushed by war, hunger and tears those penelopes without suitors, brides with extinguished smiles Those inaccessible secret wells of pleasure of long ago those antigones that evoke emptiness, emptiness without hope emptiness without echo
