Story from the East Side

Milorad Pejić

Truths are untenable! We cheered, like at the dog races, for the lies that barked the fiercest. My brother denounced the neighbor's fat cow for ruminating marijuana. For the sake of future betrayal, we all, like little Jesuses, dragged the cross of hammer and sickle on our backs. And, truly, when the iron curtain, like a shower curtain, came unhooked, and fell apart into the soap suds, naked, in seven-league boots, we leapt to the other side to be born again.
Mown grass, as it did before, smells of its own blood, just as it is, and the moon's red face gazes through cypresses, lined up like spindles, as if through the iron bars of a prison window. Only words are free! But they serve no purpose, for truths are unwelcome. In the night sky, open to all, stones bloom, and the hand of darkness harnesses the constellation of the Little Bear to the constellation of the Great Chariot. I don't understand how we manage to know nothing about it at all?
