Saša Skenderija

A nighttime panorama of Sarajevo caught by the light of shellfire, gunpowder flashbulbs, by the dance of silhouettes in which only the persistence of vision can make out the former shapes (calling up flickering skyline lights, orange neon canyons, evening crescendos of headlights tracing their fluorescent snakes on a time exposure).

But only this possible postcard can literally catch the passing of time, so the city seems to float in an intermezzo of decay, in the irreversible approach of things to their dark antitheses, my building seems to float, the City seems to float, we all seem to float,
I seem, too
